Robert T. Chase, Stony Brook University
Respondent

As universities underwent demographic shifts in the 1960s and 1970s that resulted in a more diverse student body, universities were also facing tremendous internal and external pressure to police students that dared to be part of protest or social change. As a result, universities often toggled between embracing social justice discourses and constructing their own policing mechanisms, mainly university police departments. This talk examines how diversity narratives collided with punitive discourses at public universities.
